

Set yourself apart from others . . .

Learn to speak Japanese!

I work for an automotive parts supplier here in Indianapolis. Several of my company's customers are Japanese companies. Every evening after my work day in America ends, my Japanese clients work day begins overseas. Having heard the horror stories of Americans making unreparable mistakes with Japanese, I took a beginning Japanese class at the local community college. I learned the basics, but found I needed more study of my customer's language and culture to be truly effective working cross-culturally for the long term.

I purchased a popular, expensive computer program from the local bookstore. It gave me o.k. practice opportunity, but did not give teach me any skills to formulate my own sentences about my work. I also researched the inexpensive tutoring lessons available online and discovered the reason the price was so inexpensive. The instructors tended to be Japanese born in the states or those who had moved here during high school or college, so the "teachers" really have never worked in a Japanese company. to know the language or etiquette of business. It was then that I realized that I needed an instructor who actually had experience working in Japan and working with Japanese companies in Indiana.

I was glad to find the Kanji Camp classroom. My instructors actually makes lesson for me specific to my work. Experienced in automotive and having worked in Japan and America, his instruction has really helped me make good relations with Japanese clients at work. Therefore, I recommend Kanji Camp.