

Home schooled student can find it really challenging to find foreign language study options. This is particularly true, when your student has no interest in the traditional languages like Spanish or Latin, that Mom or Dad studied in their youth. My student wanted to be different and study Asian Languages.

I was surprised to discover that the Kanji Camp's Japanese studies program offers home schoolers fair study options. At Kanji Camp, home school students can study in individualized instruction, team classes or in private lessons online. These options allow students to work at their own pace or with enthusiastic peers. Students gain personalized coaching supporting linguistic strengths and weaknesses or social opportunities with other teens from various walks of life. Kanji Camp is home school friendly.

Beyond the options to fit my family's educational needs, I valued the real world educational philosophy of the Kanji Camp program. Students in the program are only able to progress in the language based on their own efforts. Students have both individual and team assignments. They earn academic credit and prices for their work. Students who do the work advance and those who do not do the work do not advance. To me this philosophy equals employability skills, important beliefs I wanted my children to experience beyond our own home classroom.

Kanji Camp offers my students language and culture lessons. Students not only learn to read, write, speak and listen in the language, but they learn cultural etiquette and create traditional crafts, which help them better understand the people they are studying. And my students are excited about studying there!
