Interest in Japanese culture and media fuels Language Learning!

My love of Japan started with reading manga or comic books and watching animation, then I tried studying the language on my own or via internet games, but I quickly realized these methods were not yielding the results I hoped. So I trialed and began in Kanji Camp Japanese studies program.

Thanks to my instructor's enthusiasm and the way Sensei breaks down the language into easy to understand elements, my reading and writing as well as speaking and listening skills have progressed very steadily. At the program, serious students like me can learn in a traditional environment through a disciplined, proprietary study system that works! And this month I got the news that I earned world certification in Japanese.

Some of my college friends also study Japanese at university, but they cannot communicate at the same level of skill that I have achieved in such a short time. It feels good to now that my loyal investment of time, energy and effort is earning me results! I am learning towards my goals of employment at a Japanese company in Indiana.

Something I hadn't anticipated was how learning Japanese as foreign language affected more than just communication skills. My boss and parents have noticed positive subtle changes in me. I'm apparently listening better. They attribute it to my studies at the Kanji Camp program.
